auroral displays, or that the same influence will be felt in the same way to the system's remotest bounds.

Gigantic Jupiter, as his mighty mass plunges towards the sun, gives evidence of mighty forces at work among the chaotic elements of his cloud-surface. A spot has been seen on his disc for nearly a year, elliptical in form, red in color, and with a diameter of twenty thousand miles. No observer understands the cause of this huge rift. It may be an opening in the cloudrift. It may be an opening in the cloud-atmosphere disclosing the more solid matter beneath, and it may be something beyond human ken. About the 22d it is hoped that the planet will be again in favorable posithe planet will be again in favorable posi-tion for the observation of the red spot, and patient investigators will not be wanting to make the best of the opportunity. excitement induced by his movements, rising a quarter before 4; at the end of the month he rises at 2, nearly two hours and a helf before the sun.

Saturn is evening star, but no special interest is attached to his movements during the month, excepting on the 1st, when Saturn, Venus and Mercury rise within a few minutes of each other about an hour before sunrise, Venus being the brightest and farthest north, only one degree from Saturn. This planet rises at present about a quarter after 4; at the end of the month, at baff-post 2, half an hour after Jupiter.

Venus is morning star, and though at nearly her greatest distance from the earth, and rising only about half an bour before the sun, is a charming object to behold in the pleasant May mornings, as, tremulous with brightness, she gleams in the rosy glow that heralds the near approach of the sun. She rises now at about a quarter after 4; at the end of the month, at baff-post 2, half an bour after Jupiter.

glow that heralds the near approach of the sun. She rises now at about a quarter after 4; at the close of the month a few minutes before 4, keeping at nearly the same distance from the sun.

Mercury is morning star throughout the month, though after the first few days invisible. He is at his nearest point to Saturn on the 6th, and to Venus on the 19th. He rises about a quarter after 4 on the 1st, and about half after 4 on the 31st.

Nearly a is morning star after the 2d.

NEPTUNE is morning star after the 2d, when he comes into conjunction with the sun. He is in close conjunction with Mer-cury and near Venus on the 18th. As he travels on the system's extremest verge, and is now more than twenty-eight hundred million miles away, terrestrial observers will not be much wiser for attempting to will not be much wiser for attempting to trace his novements.

Mass is evening star, and still holds the honor of being the only planet visible in the evening. He shines in diminishing glory among the stars of Gemini, and is not far from Castor, the leading brilliant of that constellation, on the 15th. He is so far away, and his flery rays have become so dim, that he is not of much account among his brethren. He sets now a quarter of an hour before midnight; at the end of the month about 11.

and near Uranus on the 18th, the day after, her first quarter.

The feature of the month is the unusual number of planets doing duty as morning stars. Jupiter, Saturn. Venus, Mercury, and Neptune form the shining quintette that sing together as they walt the coming of the sun. If mortal ears are not tuned to hear the morning stars, mortal eyes sun. If mortal ears are not tuned to hear the music of the morning stars, mortal eyes will enjoy rare pictures on the celestial canwas during the mild May mornings. Venus, Saturn, and Mercury rise within a few minutes of each other on the 1st. The loveliest picture of the month is unrolled on the 7th, for the slender crescent of the waning moon, only two days before her change, is then in close vicinity to the same shining tile. Throughout the winter Venus reigned alone as morning star, and Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars, far asunder, spanned the evening sky. Now shey are all morning stars, grouped near each other and near the sun. And yet such is the variety and simplicity of the noble science of astronomy that an intelligent child can comprehend the movements of the planets.

Observers of the stars have enough to do during the month in watching the movements hereindicated, in studying the phases of Jupaer, and the retippearance of the great red apot, in noting the increase of sun spots, and in testing the truth of the prophecies of men of science concerning the meteopological changes to be expected from these selectial coincidences.
